What else do I want to say?

The course of my career in Intensive Care Medicine is the direct result of inputs from mentors along the way. I still have mentors, and a couple that act as coaches for periods of transition etc. I have gained confidence and calibration from our discussions over the years. In my position now, I am able to listen to trainees and discuss career strategy with them – It seems especially relevant given the reality that we often wear several professional hats in our work. I am willing to discuss clinical or training issues and particularly issues relating to operations, administration and quality improvement.
